DEATH CAME AT LAST

Chief Justice Hiram C. Truesdale is no More

WITHOUT PAIN

The End Known to be Near Yesterday Forenoon

A Sketch of a Life of Promise, A History of the Beginning and an Outline of the Progress of the Fatal Illness.

Chief Justice Hiram Curtis Truesdale died at half past four o'clock yesterday afternoon. He had rested well the night before. In the morning he seemed stronger and his senses more acute than they had been since last Sunday morning. But this rally was the last flicker of the candle of life, for early in the forenoon he began to sink, gradually, but steadily. Death came painlessly.

Judge Truesdale's last illness began almost exactly a month ago, though he had been in ill health for weeks before. During his visit to Santa Monica in the late summer and early autumn, he was afflicted with lumbago. A part of the time he was confined to his bed. He was not strong when he returned, and at once plunged into his usual work, both in his own office and in that of Judge Sloan at the court, where he took an important part for nearly three weeks. His condition in this case, one of the learned ever rendered in this court, involved great labor, which affected his physical condition. He returned to Phoenix on September 30. On October 2 he submitted to a surgical operation for the removal of an enlarged bony growth within his right nostril. Two days later he visited his chamber and the court room for the last time.

The symptoms of his disease were complicated and uncertain. It was at first thought they indicated typhoid fever. Later signs of meningial trouble were manifested. His condition at this time had grown so serious that Mrs. Truesdale, who was visiting relatives in Minneapolis, was summoned. She arrived, followed two days later by the judge's brother, Vice-President W. H. Truesdale, general manager of the Rock Island system. For nearly a week after their arrival there was an apparent improvement in the patient's condition and there was hope and even a degree of confidence that he would recover. Last Sunday afternoon there was a decided change for the worse, but the next morning there was an improved condition, marked by more or less favorable symptoms, which all passed away before noon yesterday. Chief Justice Truesdale was born at Rock Island, Ill., in 1860. In 1880 he was graduated from the Iowa state university at Grinnell, where he distinguished himself by hard study. After that he read law with Osborn & Curtis of Rock Island and was admitted to the bar in 1882. He went to Minneapolis the same year and formed a law partnership with Hon. Thomas Lowrey. Later he was a member of the law firm of Truesdale, Lawrence & Corriston of Minneapolis, engaged largely in corporation practice.

In the meantime he had married a daughter of Mr. R. B. Langdon, the famous contractor, and a relative of General R. A. Alger. A little more than two years ago Judge Truesdale came to Phoenix on business relating to the affairs of the Minnesota & Arizona Construction company, in which his father-in-law was interested. He has since resided in Phoenix.

The Late Chief Justice.

On the change of the presidential administration Judge Truesdale became a candidate for the office of chief justice of the supreme court. Though he had been prominent in politics, he had never before sought office. Before he was of age he had been chairman of a republican organization at Rock Island. He was a delegate to the republican national convention at Chicago in 1888 and there formed the acquaintance and gained the friendship of Major McKinley, between whom and Judge Truesdale's father a friendship had been formed at an Ohio college forty years before. The chief justiceship was comparatively easy of attainment. The judge was supported by such men as General Alger, Hon. Henry C. Caldwell, the great United States circuit judge, fifteen senators and more than a score of representatives. He was appointed on June 28. Comparatively little was known here of Judge Truesdale's legal or judicial qualifications. In fact, his personal acquaintance was limited. But from the beginning he created a favorable impression both regarding his personality and his official capability. His last work was the trial of the Seven Stars mining suit at Prescott, in which he rendered a decision which will always be regarded as a model legal document.

The people of the territory, especially members of the bar, have felt the keenest interest in his late illness, not only on account of their friendship for him, but because within the few months he had been on the bench he had given sufficient earnest of his public usefulness. He had proved that he was a man whose place it would be hard to fill.

Judge Truesdale leaves a wife and two children. Accompanied by his brother, Mr. W. H. Truesdale, they will leave tonight for Minneapolis, where interment will take place. The remains will be escorted to the depot by the governor, territorial and federal officials, by the various secret societies to which the judge belonged and by "B" company, N. G. A. Flags on the public buildings will float at half mast. The district court room and the district clerk's office will be draped, and by an order of Governor McCord, issued late last night, all territorial offices will be closed after 12 o'clock noon today.

Unusual interest attached to Judge Truesdale's illness, not only by reason of the prominence of the patient, but also on account of curious professional complications which arose during its progress. As has been stated, on October 2 an operation was performed for the removal of a bony growth within the right nostril. An attempt was made some years ago to remove it, but it was abandoned on account of the unbearable pain attending the operation. The last operation was performed by Dr. Lang. From a professional point of view it was quite successful. Two days later an intense headache, attended by a fever, set in. Whether the fever indicated an inflammation of the brain could not at first be determined. The patient grew worse and paralysis of the left side of the face and the upper left side of the body appeared. Drs. Wyllie and Duffield were called in consultation. The physicians all believed at this stage that the trouble was meningial. Dr. Wyllie believed further that it was cerebral and that possibly it was septic.

Dr. Furman was called in consultation shortly before a change of physicians occurred. It was his opinion that it was septic meningitis. Believing it possible, though, that the abscess had not yet formed he recommended the employment of active remedies. The four physicians now in the case had practically agreed upon the diagnosis. They were equally unanimous as to the prognosis. If the trouble was cerebral and septic, as their investigations had led them to believe, death was inevitable. The collapse might occur early. The disease might run a fatal course in six days and the patient might survive thirty days, but not longer. Though they had not utterly given up hope, the prognosis was so nearly devoid of hope that the friends of Judge Truesdale insisted upon admitting physicians of the homeopathic school into the case. The regular physicians were prevented by ethics from associating with them. Mr. S. R. H. Robinson, who had assumed charge of the patient, was insistent. The regular physicians withdrew and Drs. Belden and Goodwin were called in. Their diagnosis was widely different. They pronounced the disease typhoid or mountain fever, and Dr. Goodfellow of Tucson, who had also been summoned, agreed with them and endorsed the treatment which they had adopted. There was an apparent improvement in the patient's condition within the next two or three days. The progress of the disease after that has been known from time to time. A symptom which the retiring physicians had predicted would be prevalent until death, was manifest, a headache, either constant or recurrent. The physicians in attendance pronounced it to be neuralgic. The two corps of physicians even hold different opinions as to the immediate cause of death. Those in attendance believe that the patient's heart, worn by the long course of the fever, gave way. The others believe that the prediction made two weeks ago was verified, that respiration was cut off by the closing grip of the palsy. As no post mortem examination will be held, none of these varying views can ever be adjusted.
